Why do people ghost?

First, it's just one text that goes unanswered. Then, it's 10. Your calls go to voicemail and the silence grows deeper by the minute. You may start to worry: Could something have happened to your friend? What else could explain their sudden disappearance? Eventually, a social media update or a mutual friend will give you the answer. Your former confidant is alive and well. But they have just vanished from your life. They are ghosting you.

Ghosting, which means cutting off all communication without offering an explanation, has only recently entered the popular lexicon. But it's a behavior that has likely existed as long as human interactions have. The term originated in the context of dating, but nowadays ghosting also occurs in friendships, and is even becoming a noticeable trend in professional relationships: A number of employers said that they had been ghosted, a situation in which a worker stops coming to work without notice and then is impossible to contact, the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago noted in December's Beige Book, a report tracking employment trends. Ghosting is a strange behavior – why would anyone treat someone that they so recently liked so heartlessly, or leave work without so much as an “I quit” scribbled on a sticky note?

What drives this behavior? Are some people more likely than others to choose ghosting over other strategies to end a relationship? And what's the impact of ghosting on the haunted? Psychologists have only recently started to look into these questions. “There are not many published papers on ghosting,” said Tara Collins, an associate professor of psychology at Winthrop University in Rock Hill, South Carolina. But as research on ghosting begins to emerge, psychologists can also draw on what they know about the psychology of relationships to offer some clues, Collins said.

Ghosting is common and can happen to anyone. A study of 1,300 people, published in the Journal of Social and Personal Relationships in 2018, found that about a quarter of the participants had been ghosted by a partner, while one-fifth reported that they had ghosted someone themselves. Ghosting in friendships may be even more common; more than a third of study participants reported that they had ghosted a friend or had been ghosted by one. These figures may be even higher, as another 2018 survey found that 65 percent of participants reported previously ghosting a partner, and 72 percent reported that their partner had ghosted them.

Ending relationships is nothing new, and there are several different strategies people can choose. Perhaps we have just started to notice that ghosting is a common strategy, largely because technology has changed the way we interact with one another. “I’m guessing that people ignored each other for a long time. It’s just a lot more obvious now because of social media and technology,” Collins told Live Science. “When it’s so easy to contact each other, it becomes very clear when somebody is ignoring you intentionally.”

Ghosting as a strategy may have also gained popularity via new technology, as texting, online dating and social media have changed the way people connect, as well as how romantic partners find each other. Today, people can go on dates with someone they would have never met otherwise, rather than meeting them at a corner store or at their friends’ gatherings. Without a mutual social network tying two strangers together, it’s easier to just drop everything and vanish without any consequences, Collins said.
