Topic: Overtourism

(> Unit 1)

1 In an ideal world, tourism is supposed to be a win-win situation where locals and travellers both benefit. However, in the past years we've seen a rising uproar of destinations that are no longer happy with their situation. The destination attracted more travellers than it can actually sustain and becomes overcrowded. The destination experiences overtourism.

Main impacts of overtourism

At first glance, overtourism might come across as just annoying – busy and full destinations that many people like to visit. However, if you look further, there are more significant negative impacts caused by overtourism.

1. Overcrowding

Some destinations are so busy that they're overcrowded. It downgrades the experience for the travellers but also ensures that locals can't access the destination easily. This can be especially dangerous in hot areas.

2. Erosion

Archaeological sites are very sensitive to erosion and damage, for example Machu Picchu in Peru and Petra in Jordan. When too many travellers visit and walk around, the sites may be damaged. The more people are around, the higher the chance the designated paths are ignored. If not regulated and protected, archaeological sites might be damaged in such a way they lose their value.

The impact of overtourism

3. Isolation of locals

Destinations that attract a lot of visitors see an increase in local prices, mainly caused by the supply and demand of tourism. For example, there is an increased demand for short-term rentals that Airbnb can supply. However, this often results in extremely high rental fees locals can no longer afford. The consequence is that more and more locals leave a destination, with loss of authenticity as a result.

4. Pollution

Overtourism contributes significantly to pollution in travel destinations. Many of these destinations also can't support proper waste separation and recycling. This means that plastic often ends up in nature or is burned. Overtourism also increases the local carbon footprint due to travellers flying or driving to the destination.

5. Water scarcity

Even though water scarcity is not a common negative impact of overtourism, it's becoming more relevant by the day. A growing number of destinations are experiencing issues with water access in extreme dry periods. Travellers in a destination use a lot of water, for showers and personal hygiene of course, but most damagingly for swimming pools because of how unnecessary they are. When not managed well, it can endanger the water access for locals.

65 6. Problems with locals

The more travellers a destination has, the less real it feels. With an increase in number of visitors, plastic pollution, local prices and locals leaving the destination, overtourism creates a cultural divide.

to understand another culture. But overtourism makes the destination lose all authenticity and charm. Only by doing our best and raising awareness can we hope to make a difference in these amazing places.
